people were arrested and TV footage showed knives and handguns seized from the protesters. (BBC, Aug 2008).

The chaos ended in December 2008, when all the feuding parties agreed to sit and discuss by concessions and compromises on various topics, to form a new democratic society. Some opposition parties even were phased out or allowed to switch sides for the sake of the country (Xinhua News Agency, Dec 2008).

The Thais have understood that violence is a futile exercise, destructive in nature and takes to nowhere. On the hand, it was the dialogue, which helped addressing misunderstandings and devising constructive solutions. Thailand is now enjoying economic progress and development.

Bahrain government had created an atmosphere for a comprehensive National Dialogue, which was concluded recently with constructive recommendations to implement various topics political issues. But how many of our opposition groups have participated in order to bridge political differences among various groups?

The experience of the Thais should be a big lesson. They are models to countries that are caught up in a vicious cycle of violence.
